Haunted by a Spirit.

Passengers on the main stem of the Baltimore and Ohio have noticed a large yellow painted house on the south side of the road, on M. street, near Seventh northeast. It is one of those landmarks that naturally attract the eye. In this place Antonio Esellefelt, a German baker, and his aged mother have lived for a long time. When Antonio came home from Ohio, about seven years ago, in search of work, he located himself in the northeast section of the city. After procuring work he sent for his mother and in time both of them settled down in this quiet, out of the way place. A big tin plate at the top of the door designated it as 621. Antonio worked hard at first with a gay heart, but in time sorrow seemed to overtake him. His troubled looks made his customers ask him very often what caused them, but a shake of the head was the only response. During the past year his moroseness grew worse daily, and was the cause of much solicitude among those who had his interest at heart. He began to drink, and continued until it got the better of him. Saturday night, however, seemed to be an exception to those he had spent for some time among his friends. He was light-hearted and joyous and when he started for his bed room he smiled upon his aged mother. There appeared to be no disturbance or noise about the house during the night. At breakfast time Antonio did not appear, nor was he molested, as it was thought he meant to sleep later than usual. About 8:30 o'clock his mother went to his room, and the scene before her struck terror to her heart. Her son lay dead in his own blood, and on the floor was a revolver. It was not long before her cries brought help. When the police came, which was very soon, the crowd was standing idly looking at the prostrate form. It was a plain case of suicide, the fallen pistol and the dark blood oozing from a wound in the heart telling how it was done. Coroner Patterson came to inquire into the cause, and his inquiries soon revealed the story of Esellefelt's death. A few years ago he killed a fellow-man in Ohio. He was tried and acquitted of age. Shortly after his release he left the scene of his former life. He fled it, as it were, to escape the constant recollection of the murder. He came to this city a stranger with the hope of blotting out the remembrances of the past. The spirit of the murdered man haunted him like a nightmare, and he tried to drown his miseries in strong drink, but this was of no avail. He seemed to be shadowed day and night until life became a burden, reason tottered, and in a moment of hopeless despair he fired the fatal bullet and ended a life embittered with thoughts and woes that no words can describe. The coroner deemed an inquest unnecessary and gave a certificate of death by suicide. The mother of the deceased felt very keenly the sad blow visited upon her. She also attempted in the afternoon, after the inquest, to get hold of a pistol, but was frustrated. "Never mind," said she, "I will follow him in two weeks' time."—Washington Republican.
